

Noah's Ark Pet Care Club

By Amy Laundrie

Illustrated by Swapan Debnath

Mugsy, Natalie, and Denver want to go to Adventure Land, the water park where they can plummet down rides like the Belly-Buster. To earn money, they form Noah's Ark Pet Care Club. But they aren't anywhere near ready to care for a pampered pekingese, a sneaky pig, or a homesick goose.

Writing

Write an additional scene to Noah's Ark Pet Care Club. Brainstorm all the other pets Mugsy, Natalie, and Denver could get. Choose one, and write it in the center of the word web. Then brainstorm all the funny or dangerous things that could happen. After finishing the word web, you're ready to begin your rough draft. Open with a sentence that will make your readers want to finish your story. Have a middle and an end. Polish your first draft then share your story.

In a well-written paragraph that is indented, starts with a topic sentence, uses details, and ends with a conclusion, write about a pet you've had or would like to have. Your paragraph might be funny, tell about a pet's trick, or include emotions like fear, embarrassment, or happiness.

Grade your paragraph by drawing a smiley face (it could be an animal's smiley face) after those you achieved.

I indented.

I have a topic sentence.

I used at least two details.

I ended with a conclusion.

Draw Peaches the pekingese on the map of China. The pekingese is an ancient breed dating back as far as 2,000 B.C. The dogs were worshiped in Chinese temples. They were a beloved pet of the Emperor. Peaches seemed to know she was royalty.

One of the five original dogs was presented as a gift to Queen Victoria of England. Research this breed to find out why it walks bowlegged and why many Chinese pekingese were killed.

Label and color China.

Art

Cut out “peek out windows”. Staple or tape a white piece of paper underneath. Finally draw Peaches, Neon, Chatter, Python, Porkchop and Gertrude underneath. Color and display.

Science observation

The color of the anole's skin is a combination of colors. One of the most common misconceptions about lizards such as chameleons and anoles is that they change their skin color as a form of camouflage. Most lizards change their color either to regulate their temperature, or as a form of communication.

Chameleons such as anoles have a transparent outer skin, with several skin layers underneath it that contain special cells. These cells contain sacks of color pigments that can contract and expand in response to internal signals. For example, if a chameleon became excited, he might become red by causing the red cells to fully expand, blocking out the other colors beneath them. Once this chameleon calmed down, he would become green again by allowing the red cells to contract, and letting some of the blue-reflected light show through from the cell layer below.

One way to imagine this is to think about a black horse in a blizzard. When the snow on its back melts, the horse goes back to being black.

1. Gather a colorful magazine, lamp, and magnifying lens. A close-up photo or a real anole would be a plus.
2. Place a colored magazine photo under the light of a lamp. Look at it with a magnifying lens. Can you see the various colors?
3. Examine a green anole and you'll see something similar.
